I stopped in to see Cora Gaetani, at her Jansen Boutique. She had a lot of things lately arrived from Hong Kong. It is a charming shop. Tonight I took Jessie Bruce to dinner at Le Doyen, and talked to her about the matters I wanted to take up with her father tomorrow. I think she is having a rough time, since she is entirely dependent on her father, and has not yet obtained employment.

Le Doyen was a beautiful spot to lunch and dine at. Today was hot, about 80°, with brilliant sunshine.

I went down to rue Furstenberg from my quarters at the Crillon, to pay a bill for E. I ran into Madame Castaingon the street, and went with her to her storeroom underneath the Delacroix Studio. We had a wonderful time, inspecting one of the most heterogeneous masses of furniture and objects that exists anywhere. I then went to see Jessie's father, Henry Hunt, and spent the whole morning with him. He is 76 years old, and like his father before him, has led a fascinating life. Much of the early part of it was passed in Korea and China.

Things are very tangled in his son-in-law's affairs. Cabell has gone into bankruptcy, add is now working in a brokerage office in Dallas, Texas. He is making no contribution to the support of his children, and Hunt wanted me, through Jim, to inquire into what his parents may do about this.

I had an early lunch, arrived at the airport half an hour ahead of time, but through stupidity got in the wrong part of the great administration building, and missed my plane. I caught one an hour later, missed the car at the London Airport, and drove expeditiously in by taxi.

Gene Black arrived from New York tonight, and is staying with us. The Rothschilds were here last night, so I missed them again. They have now gone off to Denmark.
